THE TEXT

1. Cliff Young, a potato farmer, took part in a Sydney-to-Melbourne ultra-marathon race in 1983. Coached by his mother who was 81 at the time, Cliff Young started the marathon with work boots and overalls.
2. Competing against world-class marathon runners, who were backed up by big sports companies and had hundreds of hours preparing for the race, Cliff Young's informal training regime consists in running after his sheep. He told the organizers that if he could run after his sheep for a few days, he surely could compete with other runners.
3. The ultra marathon normally took 5 days to complete, so the potato farmer's decision seemed suicidal. In fact, some friends tried to stop him from running the super-difficult race because they thought Cliff Young could die due to the heat and fatigue. After all, he's 61 years old!
4. To cut the story short, Cliff Young managed to finish the race. While the young racers were sleeping, he continued the race throughout the night. The young athletes left him far behind until the very last night when he eventually led the marathon.
5. Cliff Young not only managed to win the marathon but also to break the race record by 9 hours! He even gave away his prize money to the rest of the runners after him. After the win, he continued to run in many ultra-marathon races and has even set standards in the world of endurance racing. His running style, dubbed "The Cliff Shuffle", is a famous running technique adopted by many runners in the world today.

The link between education and social benefits has long been recognized. In fact, education brings many benefits to society. For instance, more (educate)people tend to live longer. Early philosophers (point)out that education was central to the moral fulfilment of individuals and the well-(be)of the society in which they live. In the past few decades, research has supported this conventional wisdom, (reveal)that education not only enables individuals (perform)better in the labour market, but also helps to improve their overall health, promote active (citizen)and contain violence. There is evidence on the relationship between education and social outcomes including health, civic (engage)and social comfort in many countries where education is of great value.

These days, educating Digital Natives is presenting a challenge to parents and teachers. It seems children never get a break (from/about/in) technology. Whether at school or at home, for work or for play, there's always a screen in the room. But parents do not know (in/on/at) what point the harms of digital devices outweigh their benefits. Children love their video games. If (leave/left/living) alone, many children would have (any/no/every) problem at all spending an entire day (play/playing/played), or surfing and searching for the most recent and (challenge/challenged/challenging) ones. While this type of gaming does have its benefits, most adults will agree that a day-long gaming marathon is excessive.
